

A fair chance for all: interim report

New Zealand Productivity Commission, September 2022

The Commission has a broad vision of 'social inclusion' that frames the inquiry

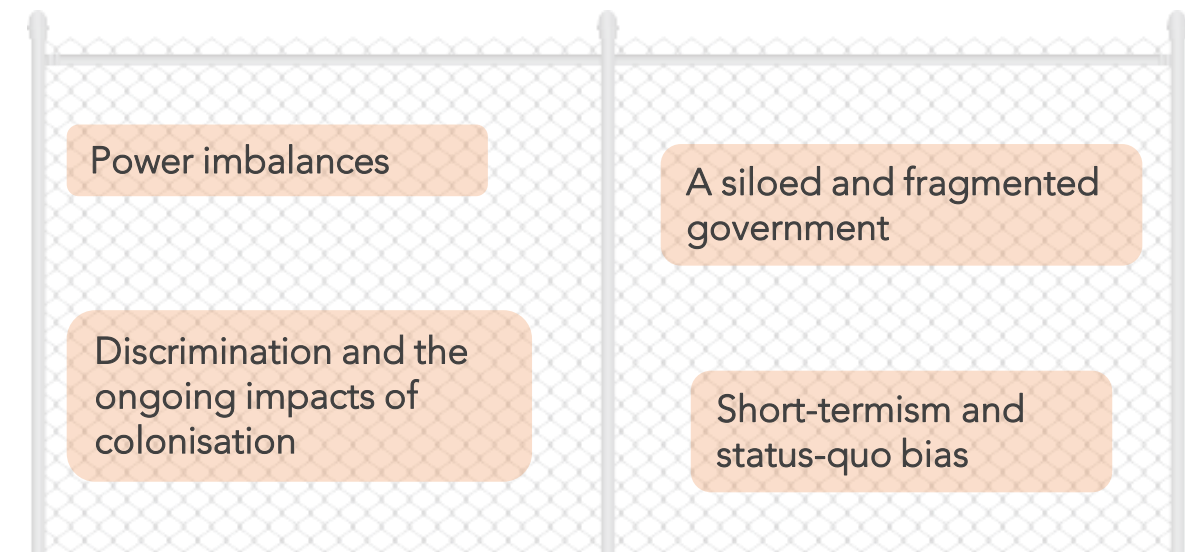

An equitable and inclusive society where all New Zealanders live fulfilling lives where individuals, families, whānau and communities:

- have a strong sense of identity,
- can contribute to their families, whānau and communities,
- have the things they need to realise their aspirations, and grow the next generation of New Zealanders

Has strong links with Māori and Pacific peoples' perspectives on wellbeing: draws on He Ara Waiora and the Pacific Wellbeing Strategy, as well as the Living Standards Framework

We identify four barriers that are holding back the public sector's contribution to eliminating persistent disadvantage

While many of us are experiencing mauri ora, too many are not

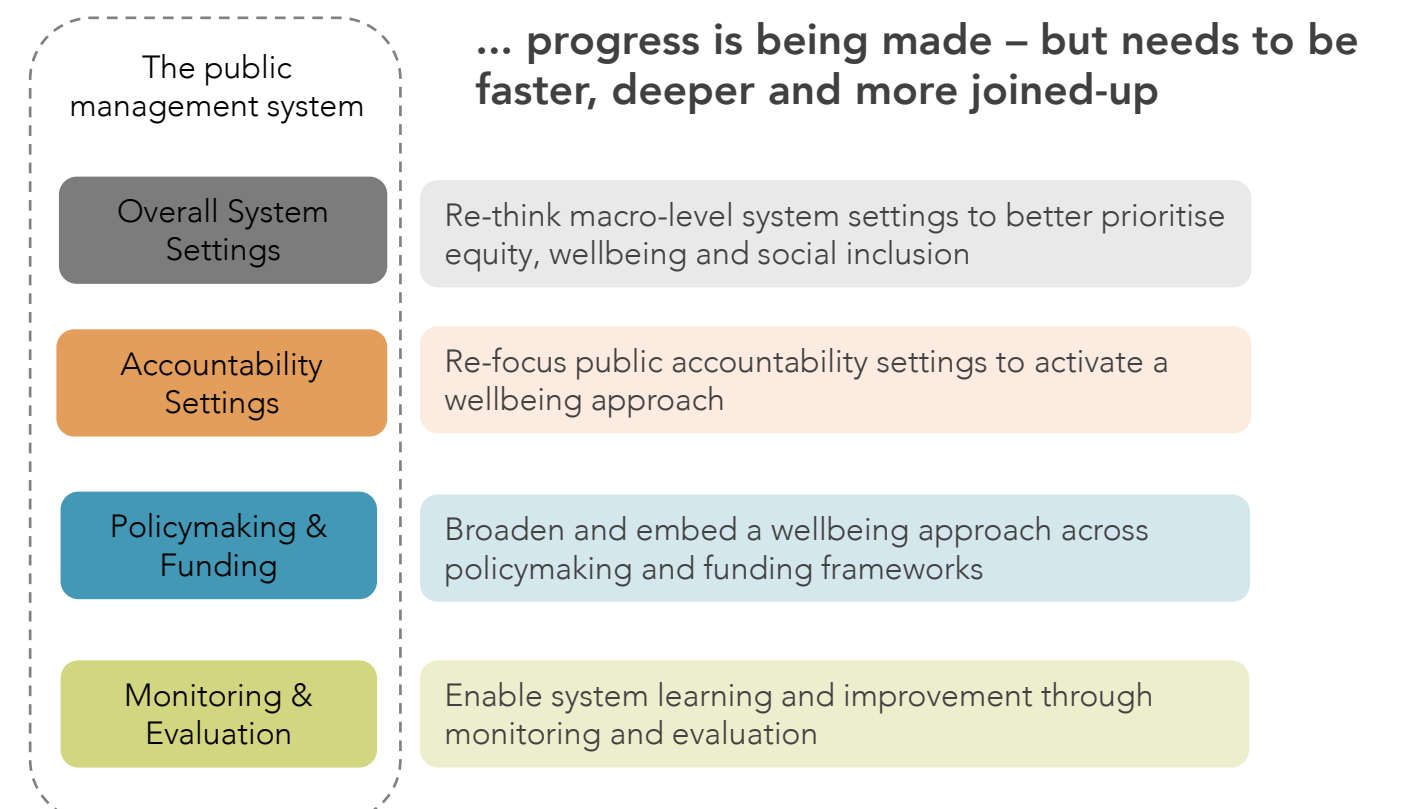

- Almost 1 in 5 New Zealanders experienced persistent disadvantage in both 2013 and 2018
- Is more than having low income
 - define disadvantage over three inter-related domains: being income poor (poverty), doing without (deprivation) and being left out (exclusion).
- Disadvantage = mauri noho
- Disadvantage that continues 2+ years = persistent disadvantage

We focus on role and settings of 'public management system':

- While the root causes of inequities in peoples' lives mainly lie outside the public management system, the system has a huge effect on peoples' opportunities to live thriving and fulfilling lives.
- Reforms in policy, practice or structures in discrete sectors, show promise for making a difference, but the Commission believes more fundamental change, to the 'macro' level settings of the public management system is required to have a greater positive impact for people and communities living in persistent disadvantage.
- We do not consider in-depth the role of Ministers or our political system, the media or wider society in effecting change, but we welcome feedback on this.

We propose four 'system shifts' to break down the barriers and help realise a more equitable and productive future for all

... progress is being made – but needs to be faster, deeper and more joined-up
